Program Number 136: Library Theory and Research Workshop

Political Perceptions of the Public Library - An international study

Delegates attending the Library Theory and Research Workshop will have the opportunity not only to hear the preliminary results from some groundbreaking research but also to contribute to the research project itself. The workshop will focus on an international study, which seeks to illuminate the political processes involved in public library decision-making. In particular it aims to provide information on governments’ attitudes to public libraries in terms of:

- their value for individuals and groups in society
- their contribution to the democratic process
- their contribution to economic development
- their contribution to policy priorities

The work endeavours to get behind the decision making process by attempting to discover the factors, individuals or organizations that influence policy makers when they make decisions about library services. Volunteers in a number of countries have already been involved in this project and it is hoped that some of these will be present to talk about the situation in their own countries.

At the start of the workshop Bob Usherwood, from the University of Sheffield in the UK and Kerry Smith from Curtin University Australia, plan to provide a brief introduction on how policy makers perceive public library and information services in different parts of the world. They will also describe the research process and hope to present some early findings from the project.

In addition, and as an integral part of the research, workshop participants will be divided into small groups to discuss and test the major themes arising from the research. Each group will be provided with a small booklet containing some research findings to stimulate discussion. This strategy has already proved very successful in other projects undertaken in the Department at Sheffield.

The final report, which should be published in time for the 2003 IFLA conference, will take account of the views expressed by delegates. The workshop therefore provides a unique opportunity to record and share experiences on an under-researched aspect of library management.

Summary of Workshop, 2001 IFLA Conference, Boston

Leadership, a much talked about concept in Library and Information Science circles, and of interest to both researchers and practitioners, was the theme of the workshop sponsored by the Section on Library Theory and Research at the 2001 IFLA conference in Boston. An overflow audience heard presentations on a variety of national leadership programs being conducted in the U.S. These programs, emphasizing leadership frameworks for library practitioners, take as their definition of leadership the one proposed by John W. Gardner in his book, On Leadership (New York, Free Press, 1990):

“Leadership is the process of persuasion or example by which an individual (or leadership team) induces a group to pursue objectives held by the leader or shared by the leaders and his or her followers.”

The program was moderated by Beverly P. Lynch, Professor, UCLA, and director of the UCLA Senior Fellows Program (www.gseis.ucla.edu/seniorfellows). The Senior Fellows program was described by Jeffrey Horrell, Harvard University, who was a Senior Fellow in 1999. The program, established in 1982, is designed for directors or people about to be directors of major research university libraries. Fifteen librarians are selected as fellows in national competition; they spend three weeks at UCLA in seminars and in working on individual projects.

Deanna Marcum, President of the Council on Library and Information Resources discussed the purpose and design of the Frye Leadership Institute, conducted at Emory University (www.fryeinstitute.org/) and sponsored by the Council, EDUCAUSE and Emory University. The purpose of the institute is to bring together tomorrow’s higher education leadership to gain insights and understanding of the various aspects of issues relating to change in higher education. About 50 participants spend two weeks at the Institute and then work on individual projects throughout the year.

Duane Webster, Executive Director of the Association of Research Libraries, described the on-going work of the ARL program on Leadership and Organizational Development (www.arl.org). ARL has been actively engaged in leadership development programs for 30 years and currently conducts about 100 workshops and institutes annually on such topics as change management, facilitation skills, decision-making, and managing group processes. Many of the workshops are designed for a specific library, but others are general and ongoing, open to librarians from non-ARL libraries.

The Urban Libraries Council, a national organization comprising the largest public libraries in the U.S., has as a major program initiative the preparation of a new generation of library leaders (www.urbanlibraries.org).
The data show that a vast majority of directors of public libraries will be retiring at the same time (within the next ten years). Eleanor J. Rodger, President of the Council, described the design of the Executive Leadership Institute that will be launched in September 2002. Teams of people from 50 libraries will be selected to participate in three institute seminars and will be provided with ongoing coaching support on a problem of specific interest to the particular library over a period of ten months. The program is supported by the libraries and by external grant support.

The Harvard/ACRL leadership program was described by Althea Jenkins, Executive Director of the Association of College and Research Libraries. The program is modeled on other Harvard Executive programs. About 50 librarians spend five days at Harvard in seminars, discussion sessions, and other activities (www.gse.harvard.edu/~ppe/).

The University of Illinois’s Mortenson Center’s new program on South African Library Leadership was described by Mariana Tax Choldin, holder of the Mortenson chair at the University. The program, in its initial phases, is supported by grant funds, and is designed to increase the leadership capabilities of libraries in South Africa (www.library.uiuc.edu/mortenson/).

Anne Marie Gold discussed the leadership program sponsored jointly by Stanford University and the California State Library. The program is aimed primarily at California librarians who have been identified as potential leaders in all types of libraries.

Members of the section’s standing committee, lead by Lis Byberg (Norway) Kerry Smith (Australia) and Bob Usherwood (UK) led the questions and the discussion on the research base for these programs. Bridging the gap between research and practice led to lively and entertaining debate and continuing conversation. (Submitted by Beverly P. Lynch, UCLA)
