0. Introduction

I am most grateful to the Chair and her Standing Committee for the invitation to tell something about my collection of library postcards or postcards with libraries or libraries on postcards .....

Of course I was flattered with the invitation, but I am also very happy to report here. It is my hope that my collection can be useful for any research or for supporting historiography of libraries.

The bottom line – of course – is that I would be most happy to welcome contributions to the collection from you in the audience, from colleagues who read this paper and from those who hear about it through the grapevine.

1. My collection – Why? An explanation

Allow me to tell you what my collection encompasses.

I have always been a postcard guy. I have carefully kept all of the cards that I received over the past half century. I have always had a particular interest in the extremely friendly format of the postcard; have used it abundantly for correspondence, for love statements, business announcements, congratulatory messages, exchanging family information, etc. etc. – there is no end to it. I just love the format, which is much more sympathetic than an email message, etc.

I started working for IFLA in 1998 and thought of ways and means to satisfy my postcard fetishism. And I decided to invite IFLA colleagues and friends to send me cards depicting libraries for the poster session I presented at our Conference in Glasgow (August 2002) <sup>1)</sup>

A call to colleagues worldwide to send me cards resulted in a couple of dozen reactions and more than 100 cards.

The idea of the poster was to encourage libraries to produce and issue their own postcards. I wanted to show that postcards are excellent means for promotion and can provide all kinds of publicity opportunities. Examples were shown of nice cards from libraries in different parts of the world, with suggestions for possible actions.

2. Historical trends: the development of the postcard

The postcard came to development during the last decades of the 19th century. The United States Postal Service began issuing pre-stamped postal cards in 1873 as a quick and easy way to send short notes.

This led soon to the absolute summit of the postcard around the turn of the century 1899/1900. How it went on is very neatly described by Richard Douglas, who mounted a very nice website together with Sharon McQueen: www.libraryhistory.org <sup>2)</sup>

It sketches the history of the American postcard, through the various phases: the Divided Back era, the White Border and the Linen era. Absolutely fascinating reading for someone like me, but I have my doubts about you in the audience.

What is very clear is that the format was a tremendous success and soon after the turn of the century it had its absolute hay day!

Another aspect that is very clear is of course that a lot of the literature describes the history of the American postcard, but as we know the world is bigger than just this sub-continent. The world history of the postcard still has to be written.

Anyway, permit me to introduce my collection to you by having a closer look at it.

3. Libraries on postcards: an account of my collection. Let me introduce the main characteristics of my collection. It consists of postcards, so not just photos, the cards have to be published and produced in series. The most obvious aspects are the following:

- 3.1 The focus is on library buildings: exterior and interior views. The focus is not on parts of the collection, famous manuscripts, particular printings or bindings.

- 3.2 There are antique and modern cards. The oldest one dates back to the end of the 19th century, while the newest was probably published this year or in any case in 2007 – I don't know exactly.
- 3.3 About half of the collection consists of black and white pictures, the other half is colour.

3.4 These are from all around the world – approximately 100 different countries are represented. It will not be a big surprise that most of the cards in my collection are depicting American Libraries, at a distance followed by six European countries: the UK, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Austria.

3.5 The total number of postcard in my collection is 10.700 at the moment and some more figures are listed here:

Table 1: Total 10.700 cards, depicting libraries in approx. 100 different countries. Some figures per country:

4. Historical research

On several occasions I have offered my collection for study or research purposes and I repeat that offer here. I will present a couple of examples of how I think cards can be used in a moment. But first I would like to mention an interesting article that was recently published by Bernadette Lear: Wishing They Were There: Old Postcards and Library History<sup>3)</sup> and I thank John Cole for bringing it to my attention.

That author gives a very nice account of both the possibilities for using postcards in library history research and the drawbacks to using them as historical sources. Her essay is a fine story based on her own private collection which she found back in a dusty carton in the back of a closet, after a house renovation. It is aimed entirely at American (local) history.

I think library history research can be supported by information contained in postcard for study and illustration purposes and I would like to give three examples.

4.1 History of an individual building: Boston Public Library

I have got some 60 or 70 different postcards of the Boston (Mass.) Public Library, dating from approximately 1900 onward. The development of both the building itself as well as its environment (traffic!) is well documented in these cards.

4.2 Architectural developments, overviews of city planning: Tours

Another nice example of the position of a library in city planning is shown in a selection of my cards of the bibliothèque municipale in Tours, France

4.3 Illustrations for historiography: Canada

Then finally I would like to show some examples that could illustrate a history of the libraries in a particular country. I selected 10 of my 170 cards from the host country of this congress, Canada – two of them are shown below.

5. Potential

Now that photography and printing are within the reach of many, many can afford to produce attractive cards at an easy manner, in large numbers in a cheap way.

These may be used as tools in various ways:

- Publicity: where the library is, services provided, opening hours

- Support of campaigns: promote reading, free access to information
- Membership rallies
- Attract or advertise sponsors
- Architects
